

Personal Injury Law Journal

Where do 400 claimant and defendant barristers and solicitors firms, NHS trusts, insurers, in-house lawyers and medical practitioners go to keep up to speed with the latest PI decisions and legislation? What is 'the best practical personal injury publication around', according to the head of Veitch Penny's insurance department? Which publication reaches across the PI community, covering issues from mis-diagnosis to multi-party actions, from catastrophic claims to compensation? Personal Injury Law Journal is the foremost journal in its field, combining practical advice with in-depth analysis. With case reports, a column on costs, and regular analysis of the CPR from a deputy district judge, the magazine is read by an estimated 1,500 practitioners every month.

'Personal Injury Law Journal is the most widely read journal in our firm. It is popular because the content of the articles can be applied to each case handler's work. The articles are written by practitioners, rather than academics, and are just the right length to read.'

Legalease Law Journals reach many thousands of practitioners each month, giving you a high-quality, focused channel into the heart of the English legal market – from support lawyers to senior partners. They are also read by barristers, in-house lawyers and specialists in the particular sector of each journal (eg trust managers for Trusts and Estates Law & Tax Journal, surveyors and property developers for Property Law Journal, HR officers for Employment Law Journal).

The emphasis is on pragmatic, business-focused advice: key legislative and case law changes, difficult areas explored, regulatory requirements explained. Each journal is both an updater, which lawyers use to keep abreast of the latest developments, and also a vital library reference tool, providing detailed analysis of particular issues for readers to refer to as and when they arise.

While the focus of each journal is on developments within English law, inevitably European, offshore and general global issues regularly arise, and these are examined for their impact on UK practitioners.

The articles are written by solicitors and barristers involved in the biggest cases and from the top law firms and chambers, while the journal editors have many years of practising experience between them. As a final step to ensure they provide the very best coverage of legal developments, each journal has an editorial board of top practitioners with a range of specialities.
